- 197. Very happily indeed we live, free from enmity among the hostile;
Among hostile human beings, we dwell free from enmity.
- 198. Very happily indeed we live, free from affliction among the afflicted;
Among afflicted human beings, we dwell free from affliction.
- 199. Very happily indeed we live, without zeal among the zealous;
Among zealous human beings, we dwell without zeal.
- 200. Very happily indeed we live, we who have nothing;
We shall be feeders on rapture, like the radiant gods.
- 201. Winning, one begets enmity; the defeated one sleeps in suffering;
The peaceful one sleeps happily, having abandoned victory and defeat.
- 202. There is no fire like lust, there is no misfortune like hate;
There is no suffering like the aggregates, there is no happiness beyond peace.
- 203. Hunger is the supreme disease, activities are the supreme suffering;
Having known this as it really is, Nibbāna is the highest bliss.
- 204. Health is the highest gain, contentment is the supreme wealth;
Trust is the highest relative, Nibbāna is the highest bliss.
- 205. Having drunk the flavour of solitude, and the flavour of peace;
One becomes free from anguish, sinless, drinking the flavour of joy in the Dhamma.
- 206. Good is the seeing of the noble ones, association is always pleasant;
By not seeing the foolish, one would be ever happy.
- 207. For one who associates with fools grieves for a long course;
Painful is communion with fools, as with an enemy always;
But the wise is pleasant to live with, like a meeting of relatives.
- 208. Therefore -
The wise one, the one with wisdom, the very learned, one of burden-bearing nature, observant of religious duties, a noble one;
Such a good person, a wise one, one should associate with, as the moon with the path of the stars.
