9. The Discourse on Friendliness

---

- 1. What is to be done by one skilled in the good, having fully realised the peaceful state;
One should be able, upright and very upright, easy to admonish, gentle and not arrogant.
- 2. Content and easily supported, having few duties and light in living;
With peaceful faculties and prudent, not impudent, not greedy among families.
- 3. And one should not practise any small thing, by which the wise among others would censure one;
May they be happy and secure, may all beings be happy in themselves.
- 4. Whatever living beings there are, whether trembling or steady, without remainder;
Whether long or great, middling, short, subtle or gross.
- 5. Whether seen or unseen, whether dwelling far or near;
Whether come to be or seeking birth, may all beings be happy in themselves.
- 6. One should not deceive another, nor should one despise anyone anywhere;
Through anger or perception of aversion, one should not wish suffering for one another.
- 7. Just as a mother would protect her own son, her only child, with her life;
So too towards all beings, one should develop a limitless mind.
- 8. And towards the whole world, one should develop a limitless mind of friendliness;
Above, below, and across, unconfined, without enmity, without hostility.
- 9. Standing, walking, seated, or lying down, as long as one is free from torpor;
One should resolve upon this mindfulness - they call this the divine abiding here.
- 10. And not having approached wrong view, moral, accomplished with insight;
Having removed greed for sensual pleasures, for surely he does not come again to lying in a womb.
